About the Seminar

Food is one of the basic needs of life. It is the great unifier that connects us across cultures and generations. Every living organism needs food, along with air and water, to survive. All the living species, except human beings, live on food as it is available in nature. In the natural surroundings, it is only humans who consume food only after processing it. All of us process food to make it not only easy to digest but also tasty to consume. No doubt, most of the fruits are consumed fresh. Still, they too undergo certain processes for the sake of preservation. Fresh and nutritious food makes us healthy, energetic and strong. In fact, we are what we eat. But the questions like what we eat, why we eat that, and how we eat make food a matter of great concern.

Actually, food quenches our hunger which is a basic instinct. Two major factors that contribute substantially to making of food are culture and science. Generally, culture is a way of life of a particular country, geographical region or a group of people. It is socially approved phenomenon that involves the traditions, customs and beliefs a group follows while performing day-to-day activities. Our food, food making and eating habits vary from region to region. In fact, they are the parts of the culture of the concerned regions. And above all, a culture is constructed with a view to benefit its followers and to enable them to lead a healthy and comfortable life. Using fruits and herbs, making food and consuming natural and handmade food differ from region to region or country to country. All these activities can be covered under a term, Food Culture which has the influence of the flora-fauna of the locality. A food culture directs us in regard to why to eat what to eat, when to eat, how to eat, where to eat, how much and how many times to eat a day. This may appear to be unscientific or even superstitious as it involves beliefs. However, it can be observed that a food culture is less a traditional belief and more a scientific attitude.
